Clean water program exceeded its annual target. Two new wells completed ahead of schedule in Q3 pushed beneficiary reach 12% past plan — the community health program is next in line for a similar mid-year capacity review.

Letter from the Executive Director

This year tested our organization in ways we did not fully anticipate. Currency volatility in two of our primary program countries meant the same donor dollar bought less on the ground than it did twelve months earlier, and we made the deliberate choice to protect program spend rather than administrative capacity — a decision that stretched our small team but one the board and I stand behind.

Despite that headwind, every program above hit or exceeded its target, and our cost per beneficiary declined for the third consecutive year. That is a credit to our field teams, our local partners, and to the monitoring-and-evaluation discipline we have built over the last three fiscal years — discipline that lets us say with real confidence, not just hope, that the dollars you send do what we say they will do.

Next year we are proposing a fifth program area: digital literacy, piloted alongside our existing education infrastructure in two regions. It is a smaller bet than clean water or healthcare, sized deliberately so a disappointing pilot costs us a line item, not a year. If it works, it becomes program five in next year's report.
